

STRATEGY SAMPLER

Teaching Artist Relationships with State Arts Agencies

Key Strategies and Management Practices

Introduction

Teaching artists are key collaborators and decision makers within an arts education ecosystem that includes classroom teachers, administrators, principals, families, arts organizations, funders and lifelong learners. With the onset of the coronavirus pandemic, it became clear that teaching artists have always risen up to provide necessary capacity building, innovative artistry, creative teaching techniques and real world connections to their communities. In 2021, teaching artists Miko Lee and Jennifer Ridgway penned a letter titled My Dearest Arts Organization, Are You Listening? inviting arts organizations, agencies, foundations and others to listen to their teaching artists and reimagine how to sustain the vitality of artists' holistic careers. It shares a collection of vital perspectives and several calls to action that organizations can put in place to strengthen their relationships with teaching artists.

The National Assembly of State Arts Agencies (NASAA) and the National Endowment for the Arts recognize that state arts agencies play an important and influential role in the development, engagement, employment and empowerment of teaching artists across the nation. Almost every state has a grant program that supports paying teaching artists to teach in a learning space, and 36 out of 56 states and territories have professional development programs or funding opportunities that support teaching artist career advancement. But no two state arts agency approaches are alike. This resource is designed to help state arts agencies understand various models for working with teaching artists, and to surface exploratory opportunities that arise in that work. This report shares a snapshot in time to describe a range of current approaches across the field, rather than a fixed catalogue.

For this research, NASAA interviewed arts education managers at six state arts agencies and reviewed publicly available program materials from all 50 states and six jurisdictions. This research made evident that major determinants of a healthy teaching artist's career include professional development pathways (Credentials and Skill Building), opportunities for networking and connecting (Community Building), pay equity and transparency (Funding and Compensation), and supporting teaching artists as culture bearers and bridge builders (Equity and Social Justice). These four areas highlight ways state arts agencies are adapting their programs, deepening their relationships, and demonstrating flexibility with rapid change. NASAA is sharing this strategy sampler to catalyze local, state and national arts organizations to conduct further research, expand conversations about teaching artist support structures, and inspire state arts agencies and other arts funders to explore new programs.

Teaching Artist Credentials and Skill Building

At times, there is the honest conundrum of defining and naming teaching artistry: it is an amorphous, changing and flowing field with multiple definitions across local, state and national organizations. This is due in part to teaching artists having to balance multiple priorities as working artists. They are caregivers; they may have to travel; they often have to get second jobs in the "gig economy"; they navigate changing tax laws for their businesses; and more. As educators, they have to adapt to new learning environments, turnover of school administration, different curriculum priorities, modality of content and even grant-making procedures changing year by year. And when social crises happen (like the coronavirus pandemic and waves of public consciousness around systemic injustice), teaching artists are often called upon to be responsive in ways they know and don't know how to be. State arts agencies are now reevaluating their competency requirements, vetting standards and professional development offerings so they can be more responsive to teaching artists' evolving needs.

Agencies describe teaching artists as:

catalysts, disruptors, advocates,
relationship seekers, culture bearers, deeply rooted, flexible, curious, boundary pushers, bridge
builders, emergent

Kansas: Partnerships with Neighbor States and Mid-America Arts Alliance

Artist INC is a partnership between the Kansas Creative Arts Industries Commission and Mid-America Arts Alliance, offering a cutting-edge training program that empowers individual artists in all disciplines to take control of their careers by connecting them to the tools, resources and opportunities necessary to develop their entrepreneurial skills and strengthen their artistic practice. Learning areas include strategic planning, building a personal brand, artist as "solopreneur" and how to fund one's practice. In its Kennedy Center Partners in Education collaboration with Missouri, the arts commission produces several regional seminars and conferences for teaching artists. The workshops equip teaching artists with the tools they need to lead both in-classroom residencies for students and professional development workshops for teachers, arts specialists and other teaching artists.

South Carolina: Teaching Artist Certification Pathways

One component of the South Carolina Arts Commission's Arts Grow SC initiative (a $20 million Elementary and Secondary School Emergency Relief III investment in the arts in South Carolina) is to develop arts industry certification pathways, much like career and technology education certifications in areas such as welding, cosmetology, etc. The agency is currently at the initial planning phase to develop a teaching artist pathway for high school students. For actively practicing teaching artists, the state offers a teaching artist certification for members of its arts directory who wish to teach residencies or work in classrooms. The certification was created in response to surveys sent to teaching artists, community organizations, teachers and administrators. The Arts Commission learned that teaching artists wanted the opportunity to market themselves and get a stamp of approval from an official organization. The agency also will be developing extended ongoing professional learning opportunities for the teaching artists who get certified through its program.

Washington: Teaching Artist Training (TAT) Lab

TAT Lab is a professional learning community of Washington state artists and educators (such as teaching artists, youth arts providers, certified classroom educators and arts education leadership) committed to refining the craft of teaching in and through the arts. Together, they engage in shared inquiry to explore connections between the daily details of teaching and social justice ideals in arts education. TAT Lab commits to thoughtful planning and reflective practice using the guiding questions, What? So what? Now what? in all learning areas. Learning goals for TAT Lab cover instructional design, social justice, connection and community, and integration of reflective practices.

Virginia: Mid Atlantic Teaching Artists Retreat

The Virginia Commission for the Arts collaborates with regional agencies to provide professional development opportunities for teaching artists. The Mid Atlantic Teaching Artists Retreat is sponsored by the Delaware Division of the Arts, Maryland State Arts Council, New Jersey State Council on the Arts, New York State Council on the Arts, Pennsylvania Council on the Arts, Virginia Commission for the Arts, and West Virginia Department of Arts, Culture and History. The retreat brings together (virtually or in person) arts education professionals from across the mid-Atlantic region to build and strengthen a regional network of teaching artists. Previous retreats have offered workshops such as The Nuts and Bolts of Teaching Artistry, Profound Possibilities of Arts Learning, The Power of Ritual Practices, Protest Poetry, Applying Indigenous African Principles in the Classroom, and Exploring Virtual Engagement for Individuals with Developmental Disabilities.

Teaching Artist Community Building

Teaching artistry can be an isolating field. As the teaching artist community continues to build national presence and recognition, there are many who still seek professional support, mentor/mentee relationships and personal connections on a local level. This highlights another key component of professional support: teaching artist voice. By intentionally and consistently including teaching artists in programmatic and policy decisions, agencies that seek to serve them can accurately represent their needs and desires. The pandemic has opened new avenues for virtual meetings, town halls, listening sessions, hangouts and happy hours for teaching artists to connect with each other and their state arts agency. As agencies see this increased need, they are continuing to invest in spaces for those connections to grow organically.

Connecticut: Artist Hub CT

In spring 2021, the Connecticut Office of the Arts, in partnership with Oddfellows Playhouse, developed Artist Hub CT, which is managed by an artist who created it. The Artist Hub CT website provides resources, event notices, and innovative and varied virtual opportunities for teaching artists to engage with one another, mentor each other, learn from one another, participate in focused professional development, and open conversations related to things important to them and their work as teaching artists. Some offerings include Mentor Mondays, Coffee with Creatives, Cocktails with Creatives, and workshops on business practices, technology usage, self care and teaching techniques. All offerings are developed by teaching artists for teaching artists.

Hawai'i: Emerging Teaching Artist Program

The Hawai'i Foundation for Culture and the Arts developed a program for emerging teaching artists that includes ongoing professional development and a paid mentorship pairing between new and current roster teaching artists. The mentorship component offers professional connections with aligned mentors, collaboration on a shared project, opportunities to observe and reflect on effective pedagogy, and ongoing support through program orientation, grant application feedback and networking.

Teaching Artist Funding and Compensation

A key aspect of sustaining the careers of teaching artists is investment in their financial health. Because teaching artists have so many different ways of working (often as independent contractors with no health benefits or steady pay), from residencies to workshops, lectures, performances, coaching and more, pinpointing a specific pay rate for teaching artists that is fair and equitable can be complex.

Certainly, many state arts agencies give explicit guidance or share public statements about the importance of fair compensation for their artists. The Kentucky Arts Council states artist compensation as a core value for greater equity. It "believe[s] that artists' time and work have real value, for which artists should be fairly compensated." The Montana Arts Council provides a reminder in its guidelines to prospective applicants: "Remember, our AISC Registry artists are professionals, and professionals get paid! Negotiate a fee for services with the artist, and put it in writing before they arrive."

State arts agencies can have an even more specific role in motivating teaching artists to be confident in knowing their worth and in encouraging organizations to pay teaching artists fair fees or wages. Whether it is in the budget review process, roster applications, professional development programs or one-on-one conversations, arts education managers are making space for teaching artists to have more agency and ownership in their entrepreneurial futures.

Washington: Holding Arts Organizations Accountable for Fair Rates

In its grant applications and budget templates, the Washington State Arts Commission (ArtsWA) challenges arts organizations and schools to pay fair rates to teaching artists and support artist career longevity. In the ArtsWA Arts in Education Partnership Grant application, organizations must concretely say what their commitment to this is. An application question states, "Describe how this project supports educators and artists in your community at this time. How will this partnership and project contribute to the creative growth and professional livelihood of educators, teaching artists, and/or practicing artists in your community? Your

Teaching Artist Decision Making

The Virginia Commission for the Arts has three board members in 2021 who identify as teaching artists and actively participate in policy voting.

The Kansas Creative Arts Industries Commission has a steering committee that consistently advises on programming and reviews roster applications.

The Iowa Arts Council's fellowship program requires participants to complete panel service as a professional development tool.

Colorado Creative Industries leans on the expertise of state and regional teaching artist organizations such as Think 360 Arts.

The Connecticut Office of the Arts employs teaching artists to lead key agency programming (Artist Hub CT).

project budget should reflect this commitment." The strength of the answer from arts organizations directly impacts grant scores and funding chances.

Virginia: Teaching Artist Fee Independence

Actively participating in pay transparency can be a valuable professional development exercise for teaching artists (and state arts agencies) to think critically about how they need to be compensated in order to sustain their livelihoods. To support this, the Virginia Commission for the Arts explicitly asks teaching artists to name their own hourly rate breakdown in budget forms. With eligibility and panel reviews, the agency can then see the range of fees teaching artists are requesting statewide, and advise teaching artists if they are undercharging (or overcharging). The Commission found that financial well-being for teaching artists is deeply personal, and often requires one-on-one relationship building or individual coaching.

Teaching Artist Fees Determining Factors

- years of experience
- location of residence
- travel/lodging requirements
- supplies required (if not included in budget)
- market industry rates of other local teaching artists
- number and type of programs at a specific location
- size and type of audience expected
- block booking arrangements
- equipment required

Several states give direct funding to teaching artists through project based grants. The Virginia Commission for the Arts's Artists in Education Express Grants, Connecticut Office of the Arts's Artists Respond Grant, and Maryland State Arts Council's Arts in Education Grant all support teaching artist work through residencies, community based projects and other education based activities. See Appendix B for a sample list of grants teaching artists are eligible for at state arts agencies, whether funded directly to the teaching artist or as a part of a larger school/organizational grant.

To see state arts agencies that stipulate a particular fee for the teaching artist, also see Appendix B.

Equity and Social Justice

State arts agencies have a public service mandate to ensure that their programs are equitable, inclusive and accessible to all constituents. Reimagining professional standards, pay equity, and community building for teaching artists can help state arts agencies strip away restrictive barriers to access while also building pathways for teaching artists to meaningfully grow their professional practice, especially for teaching artists who are negatively impacted by systemic barriers such as racism, ableism and ageism. So, too, can programs be designed to empower teaching artists, schools, educators and students to be seen, be heard and work in new ways.

Such programs may equip teaching artists to use varied instructional methods, respond to the unique needs of distinct populations or explore practices rooted in particular cultural traditions.

Connecticut: Partnership with Connecticut Center for Nonviolence

The Connecticut Center for Nonviolence (CTCN) promotes a comprehensive framework for conflict reconciliation and coalition building rooted in the philosophy and practices of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and the civil rights movement. In 2019, the Connecticut Office of the Arts initiated a partnership with CTCN to build capacity for embedding the arts into the well-established Kingian principles of nonviolence and embedding Kingian principles of nonviolence into teaching artist practice. A call invited Connecticut teaching artists to participate in training using a curriculum designed by civil rights leader Dr. Bernard LaFayette, Jr., and David Jehnsen. Teaching artists who successfully completed the training received certification in Kingian nonviolence. Connecticut now has 18 teaching artists who have incorporated Kingian nonviolence into their work in schools, libraries and other organizations throughout the state.

Kansas: Arts Labs

Arts Labs at the Kansas Creative Arts Industries Commission serve as a safe place to share and generate ideas, stimulate creativity, experience hands-on training with practicing, known professionals, build an understanding of cultural diversity and promote leadership. All labs have partnerships with community organizations and/or higher education. Previous labs have focused on music, dance and playwriting. The Commission is currently in the process of launching a Curatorial Lab, which was created in response to the lack of curators of color leading visual arts exhibits. It is working with 6 to 10 galleries throughout the state that will serve as training locations, curated exhibit locations or examples of rural exhibitions. Another project that speaks to this is the Commission's Indigenous Arts Initiative, which is investing in the network and professional pathways of Native artists to hone creative skills, expand professional networks and gain leadership experience.

Hawai'i: Culturally Responsive Institute & Roster Access

The Hawai'i State Foundation on Culture and the Arts partnered with Maui Arts and Cultural Center to develop and present the 2021 Summer Institute. All Hawai'i Roster Teaching Artists went for free, with some representatives from Alaska joining. Three major themes covered by the keynote speakers included Incorporating Indigenous Perspectives in Teaching & Learning, Radically Changing Education through Culturally Relevant Education & the Arts, and Social & Emotional Learning and Trauma-Informed Teaching for Liberation. The New Jersey State Council on the Arts took a similar approach in its Arts Professional Learning Institute, where it worked with a statewide arts education collaborator, Young Audiences of New Jersey & Eastern Pennsylvania, to present professional learning experiences so that the whole student can be reached, inclusive of race, ethnicity, gender identity, sexual orientation and perceived ability.

Overall, finding opportunities to answer the question, When they ask for teaching artists, do they mean me? in procedures, policies and applications will cultivate deeper and wider-ranging connections in arts education programming. The Hawai'i State Foundation on Culture and the Arts simplified and expanded its application process by having a public open call, training demo class observers in implicit bias, and directly assisting prospective applicants to find spaces for their demo classes that worked for their schedules. Because of these changes, the arts agency saw increased applications and roster acceptances for teaching artists in previously underrepresented arts disciplines (such as visual art) and various island communities. The Maryland State Arts Council, Rhode Island State Council on the Arts and Connecticut Office of the Arts explicitly list the types of teaching artist specialties that their rosters support and allow teaching artists to identify their unique areas of expertise. Specialties range from creative aging to work with veterans, culturally responsive pedagogy, Hawai'ian culture and traditions, and more. These are meaningful examples demonstrating that the power of naming can allow space for possibility and visibility.

About the Appendices

The appendices that follow illuminate a wide range of state arts agency strategies that work to elevate teaching artistry in their respective states. It is hoped that the appendices can facilitate contact or collaboration for states looking for peers pursuing similar or different ideas. The appendices are not comprehensive; not every program from every state is catalogued. Instead, the appendices share particular examples that demonstrate the various avenues available to agencies that want to strengthen their work with teaching artists.

Appendix A lists formalized artist rosters or directories (some that list only teaching artists, others that include teaching artists as a search option) across state arts agencies. Appendix B is a collection of grants and funding opportunities that may be available to teaching artists from each state arts agency. It also notes who determines the teaching artist fees according to the program listed: the teaching artist, the state arts agency or another affiliated arts organization. Appendix C lists a range of professional development opportunities, networking spaces and career advancement grants for teaching artists offered by state arts agencies.

This strategy sampler was authored by Precious Blake in 2021. Information about each state's teaching artist programs was sourced through selected interviews and publicly available information as of September 2021.

The National Assembly of State Arts Agencies is the nonpartisan membership organization representing the state and jurisdictional arts councils of the United States. NASAA is a clearinghouse for research about government support for arts and culture in America, providing statistical data, policy analysis and information on exemplary practices. The work of NASAA and state arts agencies is supported in part through funding from the National Endowment for the Arts. This project was made possible through an Arts Endowment cooperative agreement.
